“Mama is a Sunrise”

and we wake up glowing

She puts a spark even in Papa’s eyes and turns out all our darkness.

Even at night time Mama is a sunrise

2  SOYINKA: Kongi’s Harvest

DANLOLA:  Do you dare call this a sceptre?
This dung-stained goat prod, this
Makeshift sign at crossroads, this
Thighbone of the crow that died
Of rickets? Or did you merely
Steal the warped backscratcher
Of your hunchback uncle?

DENDE:  I got no co-operation at all
From the blacksmith. It was the best
I found in the blacksmith’s foundry.

DANLOLA:  Some soup-pot foundry. Find me
Such another ladle and I’ll
Sholve it up your mother’s fundamentals.

AMADI: The Concubine

When therefore Wigwe detected signs of his son’s aversion to the proposed marriage he was for a time at a loss as to what to do. But when he weighed the possible repercussions of breaking off his son’s long-standing engagement he grew resolute. Delicate matters were best discussed late at night or early in the morning, but as the marriage negotiations were to begin the next day there was no time to be lost. He summoned his son to the reception hall where he had been sitting. Sensing that neighbours passing by would distract him with their greetings he decided to go into his room. Ekweume followed him, breathing deeply.

‘Now, Ekwe,’ he said, ‘what were you telling your mother?’ His tone was such that Ekweume began to realize that he was causing great pain to his father. He felt a little guilty.

(i) Who is Ekweume’s mother?  [1]

(ii) Earlier on before this excerpt, the mother manages to force Ekweume to reveal the other woman in his life. How does she do that?  [5]

(iii) When Wigwe comes to learn that his son is in love with Ihuoma, he does not really blame him. Why?  [3]

(iv) Later on, what advice does Wigwe give his son to discourage him from having an interest in Ihuoma.  [6]

(v) What “repercussions ‘does Adaku earlier on foresee if the marriage engagement is broken?”  [3]

(vi) Briefly describe the kind of relationship that Wigwe and his son Ekweume shared.  [2]
